I ran into Terry in San Antonio recently and he told me in subsequent email correspondence that he had been traveling in the Davis Mountains in West Texas since our paths had crossed. I told him I'd not been to the Davis Mountains and would love to visit the world-renowned McDonald Observatory there in Fort Davis. In response, he wrote the following and I pass it along, believing it will be of interest to Terry's friends in the College who may wonder what Terry's doing with his spare time:

Well, then, I will share with you the activity that took me to West Texas last week. Since the late 1980's I have participated (and still do) in the McDonald Observatory/University of Texas at Austin Astronomy Board of Visitors. It has been an incredibly interesting and fascinating experience. The highlight each year is the annual member meeting at the Observatory. The programs at the annual meeting, and at the member meeting in February of each year, have involved truly mind-boggling information in areas completely different from those I encounter in my day-to-day law practice and other activities. I am now working with a small group on a possible new planetarium in the Austin area, so I hope to continue and even expand my astronomy activities in the coming years.
