

Amy Altshul is based outside of Philadelphia, PA and is the Assistant General Counsel, Legal Corporate Functions and Ethics and Compliance Officer for the major pharmaceutical company, GlaxoSmithKline (GSK).

In this role, she serves as the head of the legal and compliance functions for the GSK Rare Disease and Cell and Gene Therapy business units, where she advises the businesses in business development strategy and activities, operations, and general legal and compliance matters. Ms. Altshul also leads cross-functional teams to draft and negotiate complex collaboration agreements, equity investments, and company and business acquisitions and divestments for GSK.

Prior to working with GSK, she was a senior counsel for business development activities at Wyeth pharmaceuticals, and then for Pfizer, Inc. following Wyeth's acquisition by Pfizer in 2009. She has nearly two decades of legal experience, including work in private practice for a major global law firm in New York and Washington DC. Ms. Altshul holds degrees in chemistry and biology from Duke University and worked as a biochemist studying secondary leukaemia at the National Cancer Institute before attending Cornell Law School. She enjoys yoga and trying to keep up with her three children in her free time.
