Tools of the Open Science Trade: How to Facilitate Preregistration and Other Best Practices

David Mellor - Project Manager, Center for Open Science

The purpose of this session is to provide practical examples, suggested workflows, and tools that managing editors can use when implementing open science initiatives. Beyond open access, these tools will focus on making parts of the research workflow more transparent, such as underlying datasets, analytical code, and decisions that researchers make before and after collecting the data. These tools will help to reduce bias and to make the reported research easier to replicate. The session will include demos, cover FAQs, and is designed to provide those in attendance with practical next steps.
