A father uses his son's autographed baseball to explain: This four-dollar baseball became a very valuable baseball when a famous player signed it. But if you and I sign a four-dollar baseball, it's still a four-dollar baseball. But, there are things people like you and I can sign that make them very valuable. . . Checks, credit card forms, petitions, package receipts, and union authorization cards.

The father turns to his son's computer, pulls up current statistics on union membership losses, strikes, decertification petitions. Eleven talented, professional career actors in 15 dramatic scenes depict union recruiting efforts and peer pressure exerted to get employee signatures.

Quotes from national union leaders on membership loss and the resulting loss of unions' ability to gain at the bargaining table are included.
