

The longtail of news: To unpublish or not to unpublish

APME Online Journalism Credibility Project

By Kathy English ♦ Public Editor ♦ The Toronto Star ♦ October 2009

Discussing “unpublishing” with the public: A suggested script

Thank you for writing (calling). We are guided by a newsroom policy that says it is inappropriate to remove published content from our Website. If an article is inaccurate we will correct it and tell readers it has been altered. If relevant new information emerges, we will update the article or do a follow-up story.

As with our newsprint version, our online published content is a matter of public record and is part of our contract with our readers. To simply remove published content from the archive diminishes transparency and trust with our readers and in effect, erases history. This is not a practice engaged in by credible news organizations or in line with ethical journalism.